Effect of gastric acid control on elimination of metoclopramide (Rheumatex) from the stomach in man. The effect of four different antisecretory regimens on the gastric and plasma clearance of metoclopramide was studied. In fasted volunteers, acidification of the stomach prevented gastric emptying of metoclopramide, but had no influence on its hepatic first-pass metabolism. Antisecretory regimens with cimetidine increased gastric retention time of metoclopramide, and potentiated its gastric emptying and plasma clearance. These properties of cimetidine were retained after acute and continuous administration. In contrast, ranitidine and pirenzepine were devoid of any influence on the gastric emptying of metoclopramide. However, there was only a slight inhibition of gastric acid secretion and a suppression of the plasma clearance of metoclopramide following acute and continuous administration of ranitidine. A summation of the findings suggests that metoclopramide is rapidly and completely cleared from the stomach in man. However, it is likely that some of the drug may be swallowed with the gastric contents, a condition which can easily be avoided by proph
